NEWEST CAPITAL IS RAILROADLESS

Tegucigalpa Selected by Central American Federation on High Level.

"If the United States, according to criticisms in 1911, selected a site for its capital far from the beaten path, the newly formed Federation of Central America has selected one that is even more remote and inaccessible," says a bulletin issued by the National Geographic Society. Tegucigalpa (a name which when properly pronounced brings to mind the "goosey-goosey-gander of nursery rhymes") is now the capital of Honduras, one of the members of the new union," the bulletin continues. "It might be termed the 'Lhasa of the West,' but not because it is a forbidden city by the edict of man. Its citizens have their share of the hospitality for which Latin America is noted, but nature has placed rough country between the city and the two oceans that bathe the shores of Honduras, and man has done little to overcome the handicap. It is the only capital on the North American continent that has never echoed to the more or less musical blast of a railroad locomotive, and one of the few railroadless capitals in the western hemisphere. Nor may one yet travel to the new national capital by automobile.

Eighty Miles From Port. Tegucigalpa is some eighty miles inland from its Pacific port, San Lorenzo, on highlands more than 6000 feet above sea level. A road, which is more than a trail but less than a highway, connects the two points. The most ambitious name that it can lay claim to is "cart road." Travelers do the eighty miles in three days by mule back, and if they are traveling light, may take their belongings along by pack mule. Trunks must follow even more slowly by ox-cart. In the interior of the country, with its flanks in the air, as a military man might describe it, is a fifty-mile highway in good condition extending between Tegucigalpa and the second most important town of Honduras, Comayagua. Over this road automobiles operate regularly.

Tegucigalpa is more than 100 miles from the Atlantic, or rather, the Caribbean sea, but Americans can reach the capital more quickly from the Atlantic than from the Pacific side, due to the fast steamer service from New Orleans and Mobile. Puerto Cortez is the north shore port. From there a railroad extends for a short distance toward the interior, and from the rail head the journey by mule back to Tegucigalpa occupies five or six days.

URGES ECONOMY FOR ALL.

McCormick Says State and City
Must Follow Federal Lead.

CHICAGO, September 28.—The United States must make efficient and economical public administration if it is to reduce its burden of taxation, Senator Medill McCormick said in an address before the Chicago Church Federation. Ending of the vast armaments of the world is not alone the problem, he declared.

"We must seek to reduce public expenditures in the city, in the state, in the nation," he continued, "and thus lighten the burden of the taxpayer and the consumer. In Washington we have made progress in the curtailment of appropriations. The expenditures of the national government have been reduced 40 per cent over a period of two years, at the same time that local taxes have increased a like amount.

"If government is to discharge its duties to the citizen, and at the same time the burden of taxation is to be lightened, we must seek to energize, to make efficient and economical the administration of the public services."
